
"Stevie" is a film that looks at families in often ignored American places. Set in and around a rural New Jersey train station, the film, directed by first time film director Steve James, is about a boy with autism who was put into foster care because of his behavior. The film explores the family's struggle to come to terms with Stevie's disability and how they navigate this difficult situation. It offers a powerful examination of the challenges faced by families with autistic children, as well as the difficult choices they must make to provide care for their loved ones.
